The delusion of self-determination

■ Speaker: Andrew Sach

Our culture promises, like the popular children's books, you can choose your own adventure. In some ways it is true. Never before in history have ordinary people had such freedom to decide where we live, what career to pursue, whom to marry and what we look like. But how far does the list continue? Can we choose our gender, race, life-expectancy, political future or even eternal destiny? What about those times when it is painfully obvious we are not in control? And what if it is better that we are not?
